HISTORY OF THE BRITISH TURF.

Turf," by James Rice, in two volumes (Sampson, Low & Co., London), can hesitate to believe that horse racing is the Briton's favorite sport. The patrons of the turf have long been members of the nobility and of royalty itself. The fact that Parliament adjourns for the Derby proves more elo-quently than words the national interest in the sport. Mr. Rice claims that his book is the first popular account of the sport heretofore published.

In it he gives interesting facts connected with the turf, the pedigrees of some of the best horses, short historical notices of those localities famous in connection with the sport and biographical sketches of the "principal actors in its varied scenes, from the earliest period to the present day." Never before funds at the disposal of the Race Committees so large. At the recent Ascot meeting, he says, no leas large. At the recent Ascot meeting, he says, no leas a sum than £14,550 was given in added money to the various stakes during the four days, £2,000 being added to the Hurdwicke Stakes alone—a race named in compliment to the Master of the Buck hounds, while £8,000 have been expended since last year in replacing the old Alexandra stand by a new and handsome structure. The sporting literature of the country has increased to a remarkable degree. The sporting press is now represented by one daily, one tri-weekly and six weekly papers in London, while every newspaper in the country has a certain amount of space devoted to this branch of sport. Besides these there are sporting almanacs, the Racing Calendar and any number of sporting an-horse was first brought to England from France. The native stock, remote descendants of these Gallie The native stock, remote descendants of these Gailic sires and dams, were by no means contemptible animals, for we are told that James I. gave £154—in his time no inconsiderable price—for a horse for breeding purposes. This sovereign it was who introduced horse racing into England and offered a prize of a silver bell, for which reason races were frequently called bell courses. It was not until the Ministry of Pitt that horse racing became a source of revenue to the crown. Mr. Pitt decreed that a tax should be levied on every horse that "ran for a plato." He was opposed by the Duke of Norfolk, but to no purpose. The "Father of the Turf," Mr. Rice says, was the name awarded to Trogonwell Frampton, a gentleman of some small landed estate, originally keeper of the King's running horses. This "father" reflects little credit upon the turf, for he was "a monster of avarice," and "cared for little else beggles money," an unusual trait in a sporting man. The painy days of the turf can hardly be said to have begun before Diomed won the first Derby. It was about that time the reformation in jockeys' costumes was begun. Jockeys had been in the habit of dressing in long, pointed caps, with their hair falling to their shoulders, and a long tailed coat on their backs. In fast riding these tails were very annoying and a jockey, who was very much disturbed by them, tucked them inside his trousers. That was somewhatuncomfortable, but it was not long before some one suggested to cut off the Monding tails. This advice was immediately followed, and lo! the modern jockey's dress!

One of the most interesting sketches in this book is that of Richard Tattersall, tounder of the famous Tattersall's, of London. Mr. Tattersall owed the foundation of his fortunes to the celebrated racer Highlyer, and he was so proud of this fact that when he became a wealthy man and built himself on degant mansion he called it Highfyer Rall. Originally a wool comber. Mr. Tattersall's fondness for horsefiesh showed tivelf at an early sage, and he found empl

ART IN "HARPERS" FOR DECEMBER.
The illustrations in the December number of the series of portraits which accompany the opeing article, "The Fortunes of the Bonapartes," the series of portraits which accompany the opening article, "The Fortunes of the Bonapartes," is very unequal in merit, there are several good ones, notable among which is Johnson's engraving of the picture of "Napoleon as First Consul," that of "Napoleon I., Emperor;" "Napoleon II., Duke of Reichstadt," and those of the Empresses Josephine, Maria Louisa and Eugeine. Miss Curtis is as charming as usual in her drawings of scenes in "The New York Cooking School." A. B. Frost's figure sketches enliven the illustrations of the city of Atlanta. A certain amount of good work in drawing and engraving is shown in the rather conventional and heavy cuts which picture "The Palestine of To-Day." Howard Pyle distinguishes himself in his asimirable pictures of the old times in New London. "The Recruiting Office," the "Portrait Galiery in the Shaw Minsion" and "The Old Tiled Fireplace in the Winthrop House" are especially noteworthy. There is nice sentiment, good color and undecided and poor drawing in Maria P. Oskey's illustration of the poem "Blossoms." The left hand is delicately given. Edwin A. Abbey is very felicitous in his five drawings to the bailed of Whitington. The last two are misterly, and the second, well engraved by Yuengling, is charming. We must congratulate C. S. Reinhart on his outline illustrations of the second paper on "The Connemara Hills."

A. H. Thayer has in his studio, nearly finished, some admirable pictures painted to near completion out of doors this summer. In one of the most important are cattle in an extensive landscape, the foremost of which are in the high grass of a depression between the low hills. The hot, misty feeling of a summer afternoon, with its delicate evanescent effects of hight and shade, are finely reproduced, and the well drawn cattle are in good motion and effectively introduced.

Among the arisis who have within a few days returned to their studios are A. H. Wyant, T. L. Smith, J. C. Nicoli and E. L. Henry.
